

2009

PLANT
PHENOLOGY
JOURNAL

2009

PLANT
PHENOLOGY
JOURNAL

“The white maple keys are about half fallen. It is remarkable that this happens at the time the emperor moth (cecropia) comes out.”

-Henry Thoreau

“I soon found myself observing when plants first blossomed and leafed, and I followed it up early and late, far and near, several years in succession, running to different sides of the town and into neighboring towns, often between twenty and thirty miles in a day. I often visited a particular plant for and five miles distant, half a dozen times within a fortnight, that I might know exactly when it opened, beside attending to great many others in different directions and some of them equally distant, at the same time.”

-Henry Thoreau

“The white maple keys are about half fallen. It is remarkable that this happens at the time the emperor moth (cecropia) comes out.”

-Henry Thoreau

“I soon found myself observing when plants first blossomed and leafed, and I followed it up early and late, far and near, several years in succession, running to different sides of the town and into neighboring towns, often between twenty and thirty miles in a day. I often visited a particular plant for and five miles distant, half a dozen times within a fortnight, that I might know exactly when it opened, beside attending to great many others in different directions and some of them equally distant, at the same time.”

-Henry Thoreau